Anton Suhanov

🌐 www.anton-suhanov.com

📷 anton.suhanov

In 2016, Anton Suhanov broke into the world of haute horlogerie (the High Art of Watchmaking) when he completed his ambitious project—the Black Clock tourbillon table clock. He embedded a clockwork with an impressively large triple-axis tourbillon and that same year, he was awarded the winner at AHCI (Académie Horlogère des Créateurs Indépendant) Young Talent Competition.

One day, while driving his car to the workshop, Anton was inspired to design a Racer Jumping Hour GMT wristwatch. Stemming from the desire to create a one-of-a-kind fusion of horological mechanics and emotions, the structure of the dial has been refined to feature two retrograde hour and minute subdials that dominate its surface. They are located on the left and right and slightly shifted down—exactly for one's position on the (imaginary) hour scale of the dial—while the remaining central part of the dial is given away to other pointers. This particular arrangement has historical prototypes; one of them is the dial of the famous pocket watch “Marie Antoinette”, a lifelong masterpiece of Abraham-Louis Breguet, with two retrograde subdials of date and equation of time.

Beaubleu’s visionary leader, Nicolas Ducoudert-Pham, renowned for his expertise in automotive and luxury product design, has woven storytelling and material mastery into the brand’s DNA.

Started in 2017, Beaubleu is a Parisian watchmaking Maison that breaks free from the codes of classic watchmaking by bringing a second vision to watch design. Beaubleu’s circular hand watches were derived from two reflections: time and experience. Time is a material with which we interact, it all depends on how we perceive it. We can speed up time by moving or slow it down by focusing on minutes; time is ours. From this reflection, the watch is not a simple tool but a real object of desire, which each person is free to interpret.
